"When we have learned how to listen to trees," Hermann Hesse wrote in his lyrical love letter to our arboreal companions, "then the brevity and the quickness and the childlike hastiness of our thoughts achieve an incomparable joy." Two generations earlier, a different titan of poetic sentiment extolled trees not only as a source of joy but as a source of unheralded moral wisdom and an ...

Arnold Keyserling was the first modern philosopher to discover the basic constitutional Laws by which we can attain mastery and true individuality. As he sometimes puts it, these are the criteria by which we can attain "coherence in a chaotic world". In philosophic terms, he searched for and eventually found the "a priori synthesis" or long-lost "philosopher's stone".
